

Reducing Test-Taking Anxiety

Test anxiety is the result of excessive worry by a student about doing well on a test. This can become a major hindrance on test performance and cause extreme nervousness and memory lapses among other symptoms.

The following are tips on reducing test-taking anxiety:

- Being well-prepared for the test is the best way to minimize test-taking anxiety.
- Space out study over a few days or weeks and continually review class material. Do not wait until the night before to learn and/or review test materials.
- Try to maintain a positive attitude while preparing for and while taking the test.
- Exercising for a few days before the test date can help reduce stress.
- Get a good night's sleep before the test and eat a light, healthy meal before testing.
- Show up in class early to lessen worry about being late. Bring any required testing materials.
- Stay relaxed. Taking a few slow, deep breaths can reduce anxiety.
- Read the test directions slowly and carefully. Don't hesitate to ask for clarification from the instructor.
- Skim through the test to estimate time needed and pace the speed of answering questions accordingly.
- Write down important formulas, facts, definitions and/or keywords in the margin first to reduce worry about forgetting them.
- Answer simple questions first to build confidence and allow needed time for the more difficult questions.
- Do not worry about how fast other people complete their test. Speed is not an indicator of success.
- If unable to answer a question, skip it and come back to it later as time allows. Remember that it is not necessary to answer every question correctly to do well.
- Stay focused on each question and concentrate on successfully completing the test.

If you still experience extreme test anxiety after following these tips please contact the ASC!

Gordon Kelley Academic Success Center
Vines Building, Room 202,
(479)788-7675
asc@uafs.edu